"Learn to build quantum algorithms from the ground up with a quantum computer simulated in your browser," suggests a new online course. "The very concept of a quantum computer can be daunting, let alone programming it, but Microsoft thinks it can offer a helping hand," reports Engadget: Microsoft is partnering with Alphabet's X and Brilliant on an online curriculum for quantum computing.

Slashdot: Developers

@KyleDelaney --- it's a header. Different first page is all there is. A header is meant to be duplicated. I'd suggest that if you want to do each page different (it will no longer be a header then it would be just text), then uses a text box, then choose properties in that text box, select float over text, that way you can put it up in the margins where the Header would be.

How do I create a header on only one page in Microsoft Word?
